The plaintiff further states that he had no information concerning Australian Banks, and that the changing or negotiating of the notes of such banks is outside the regular course of his business, but being willing to oblige the defendant, a customer, he consented on the 24th of December to negotiate it upon the condition that the defendant should repay or refund what he obtained from him in case of the ultimate nonpayment of the note. And on the 29th of December the plaintiff-alleges that defendant agreed to that condition. In consequence, the plaintiff says he paid to defendant $293 and took the bank-note. The plaintiff alleges that he used all due diligence to obtain the payment of the said note, but failed, as there was no such bank as the Royal Adelaide Bank of South Australia, and he further alleges that defendant, when asked for repayment, refused to comply. The plaintiff further sets up that the defendant warranted that the document was a bank note and a valid and subsisting scenrity, &c., whereas no such bank as that alleged ever existed, &c. The answer sets out that the bank note was the property of Cheung Sing Nam, a Penang trader, who was lodging at defendant's bearding house, and was not the property of the defendant. The defendant also says that the said note, at the equest of Cheung Sing Nam and by the defendant's permission, was taken by one Tam Sun, a servant of the Yan Wo Chan, to the plaintiff's bank to be changed into dollars for the use of the said Cheung Sing Nam, and was on or about the 29th of December, 1887, changed by the plaintiff for 8293 carrent monies of Hongkong The defendant denies that he or any one on his behalf or to his use received the said sum of $293 or any portion thereof-but the said monies were received by the said Tam Sun on behalf and for the use of the said Chenug Sing Nam, and were paid into the hands of the said agreement for the refund of the $293 claimed to get a note changed. It was a large amount, Witness said "At the Police Station the oustomer told how it was-that he asked the master to give the note to Tam Sun to take and change." Cheung Sing Nam, from whom the note was got by the assistant accountant of the Bank, says he gave it to Tam Sun to get change; and that he mentioned to the master that he had given the note. He-went-to Canton on the night of the 24th December and returned on the 28th, and got the change and went back again to Canton on the 29th December. The note, he says, he got from a Penang trader to buy goods for him and he bought them and paid for them with the proceeds. Lo Kum Chin admits that he knew of the note having been given but did not see it or given authority. Tam San also said hedid not tell the Bank the name of the customer. I have set out the evidence at great length beodours, viz to arrive at a conclusion as to the exact facts. The question to be determined is: Did Tash Sun agree with the plaintiff that if he bought the note it would be paid by the master of the Yan Wo Chan, and, had he any author rity to make such an agreement,-either express or implied authority. This was not an obligement of changing a note as a favour, as alleged in the petition. The plaintiff got $15.68, for the business. It was a purely business transaction, and was there anything in the course of business between the Yan Wo Chan and the Chinese Bank that would justify the Chinese Bank in saying that the master of the Yane We Chan had clothed his assistant accountant with and held him out as having general authority to make an agreement, such as is alleged in this case. I think not. They never had such a transaction before. He had exchanged gold and local notes, but not Australian ones, and then, he was not considered as acting for his master or by his orders. But did the plaintiff give the assistant accountant express authority in this particular case? After careful consideration I have come to the conclusion that he did. It is admitted that he knew of the exchange of the note, and that it was left behind by the customer, and that he had boon spoken to by the customer about it. It would also appear that the eastomer said that he had asked the master of the Yan Wo Chan to have it changed for him. The native bank witnesses all swear to the fact that Tam Sun had said his master sent him, and that he would not say anything about an offer until he told his master, nor whether the Yan Wo Chan would agree to refund in case of non-payment. They also state that he came back and said the masier agreed. Tam Sun's conduct also at the Hongkong Bank goes for something, as well as the statements of the master of the Yan Wo Chan, in March, when application was made for a refund. In the result I have come to the conclusion that Tam Sun said he acted under the authority of his master, in December, and that he really did so act although it suits both to deny the authority now. He gave a receipt he admits "as proof," which corroborates the statement of the bank people in their version of what took place, and the present change of front is perhaps not unnatural in order to escape a liability which the boarding house no doubt feels it should not be saddled with. The owner of the note is here and he will doubtless indemnify the boarding house, but I am satisfied the native bank did not know Chaung Sing Nam in the matter, and that they gave credit to plaintiff through his agent, who had express authority to bind bim. Judgment will therefore be for the plaintiff, with interest from 19th March, with POLICE COURT 16th Jano.

Alex. Moneur sworn-I am chief officer of the steamer Lennoz. It was reported to me at 12 noon yesterday, that two bottles of whiskey were missing from the hold. I went and found two bottles produced in prisoner's bank in forecastle... I also found there two dozen electro-plated forks. Defendant in being charged with theft of these things, heaved one bottle at the boatswain and cut his foot: I then went into the hold and found that two bottles of whiskey were missing from one case and one buttle from another. I also found a case of forks broken open. The rest of the forks were like those now in Court, and found in possession of defendant. The whiskey in the cases was of the same brand as that found in defendant's bunk. Defendant was drunk all day. He is an A. B. seaman.

Corroborative avidence was given by the boatswain and two of the crew of the steamer Lennow. Prisoner pleaded guilty, and was sentenced to three months' imprisonment with hard labour.
